Excerpt: . . . A HEART OF OAK One evening just as the purple dusk of a hot Summer day was settling over the earth, two magnificent gypsy wagons stopped on the grassy plot below the bridge that spans the channel at the Weirs, N. H. The fine black horses were unharnessed and hitched to some small trees near by, a tent was pitched, a fire was built, and soon the little family was settled for the night. By and by, the sweet strains of a violin, rose and fell in perfect rythm under the delicate touch of the bow in the hand of a master of the instrument. For an hour or more the sweet music drifted upon the perfumed air of the lovely place, while every ear at the Aquedoktan Hotel was listening to the soulstirring and heaven-inspiring notes. But as the night came on, the music ceased; the flaming camp-fire began to die down, and the smoke silently drifted toward the north. Soon the morning dawned in all its beauty, and the camp-fire was again started. It was indeed a beautiful day, full of warmth and sunshine. Near one of the wagons sat a beautiful girl of about eighteen, with dark hair and bright laughing eyes. She was arranging bunches of violets she had gathered from the neighboring woods, to sell to the people at the hotels. There! she said, holding them at arms length, they are only the modest little violets of the woods,...
